The Duluth Complex in Minnesota is one of the largest undeveloped mineral deposits in the world. More than 4 billion tons of copper, nickel and precious metals have been here for millions of years, but we’ve only known about them for about the last 60 years. The technology to extract and process these deposits is now economical and can be done in an environmentally responsible way.

Outreach is current underway with states, vendors, academia and others to understand issues and evaluate approaches to dealing with waste water. To help frame the conversation, the following discussion topics are suggested:

1. Produced water management - pros/cons with the status quo.
2. Produced water management alternative options - technologies, availability, drivers, etc.
3. Current or future produced water management barriers to alternatives.
4. Concerns related to federal regulations that allow for the discharge of treated produced water to surface waters and/or to municipal wastewater treatment.
5. Challenges to permitting facilities that treat and discharge produced waters.
6. Appropriate level of treatment required for produced waters that will be discharged to surface waters and/or Publicly Owned Treatment Works (POTWs).
7. Existing state regulations/requirements that conflict with a different federal approach to produced water management (e.g., water rights).

Comparative Study of State Submerged Land Usage & Fees

Most member states have vastly different roles and responsibilities for public trust lands in their state. Some have dock-out and leasing responsibility, some must manage aquatic invasive species, and others have no role in these governance areas. As a first step to understanding expertise and knowledge among members, this session will focus on facilitated data capture of various roles, instruments used and fees structures. Information gathered will be shared with all members after conference.

A panel of states (ID, OR, MT) will lead off discussion, followed by state-by-state sharing and live data capture.

Each state is asked to bring (or reference online) submerged land usage documents (permits or lease samples) and fees schedules.

5:15 – 5:30 PM State and Affiliate member issue identification
